

Credit Scoring

Here's how we work out whether we can give you credit and what you can do if you're refused it

So what is credit scoring?

You've probably heard of credit scoring. Most of the bigger financial organisations use it to work out whether they should lend money to people who apply for credit. This booklet aims to remove some of the mystery and explain how credit scoring works, how we use it, how it affects you, and what you can do if you think something's not right.

How does it work?

Whenever you apply to a financial organisation for credit such as a loan, credit card or mortgage, they may 'credit score' you. It helps them decide whether to say 'yes' or 'no' to your application. Credit scoring is basically a system that looks at how your other, similar accounts have been performing and based on this, it predicts what might happen with your credit account.

Points are awarded to all the relevant parts of your application and then added together. It's this final score that counts. We use it to assess the risk involved in giving you credit. And then decide whether we can go ahead and accept your application.

The ins and outs of credit scoring

When you want to pay for something quickly and easily, a loan or credit card can come in very handy. But at the same time, you don't want to find the repayments a struggle. That's why we use credit scoring. It helps us make sure you're less likely to get into difficulty – borrowing money you can't afford.

Credit scoring helps us make sure everything is fair. We treat all applications in exactly the same way, so that all our customers receive credit impartially. And we constantly check the accuracy of our systems.

Building up your profile

Usually, we need just three main pieces of information to build up your profile and give you a credit score:

- The details you gave us on your application form
- How you've managed other accounts with us
- Information from a national credit reference agency

We use all these details about you, such as your age, employment history, any existing credit you have with us and other lenders, to build up your profile. How you've managed previous accounts – plus any other factors that we know to be good indicators of risk, also help.

Refused credit? Here's why . . .

It doesn't feel great to be refused something. So if you're ever turned down for credit, you'll probably want to know why. Below you'll find some reasons why your application might have been declined.

Why we sometimes refuse credit

If we turned down your application, it simply means that, on this occasion, either:

- Your overall credit score wasn't high enough to reach our acceptable 'cut-off' score

OR

- We can't offer you credit because of certain criteria on our policy, such as – we don't offer credit to people who might find it difficult to meet the repayments.

If any of this happens to you, don't take it personally. It doesn't mean we think you are a bad payer, or we've received some crucial information about how you manage your finances. It simply means that, based on past experience, people in similar circumstances to you were more likely to experience problems repaying their credit.

We'd never want to upset anyone by refusing them credit, but we must reserve the right to decline certain applications. To work out your credit score, we use many individual pieces of information. So there probably isn't one single detail that would lead to your application being refused.

That's why we can't always be absolutely specific in what we can tell you, such as details on our scoring levels or how we calculate your score. Why's this? Because making this information public might make our system less secure. People could, for example, use the information to make fraudulent applications. So we always keep the scoring details confidential.

Got other credit with us?

You might be wondering why we'd accept your application for one type of credit, but refuse it for another. This is because your circumstances and our policy may change over time. And all we can then do is take into account the information that's currently available.

How to appeal against our decision

If we've turned you down for credit, you can ask us to reconsider and to look at your application again – particularly if you can give us more information to support it. Without new information it is very unlikely that we will be able to change our decision. Contact your mortgage broker and say why you feel the decision is wrong.

If you think that information held about you at a credit reference agency is wrong, you should contact them and ask them to put it right (see page 9 for credit reference agency contact details). You should also contact the company that registered the information if you think they have made a mistake.

When to apply again

Your circumstances may change in the future and we'd be pleased to consider a new application at any time. There's no cut off point to when you can re-apply, and we won't refuse an application just because we did last time. Chances are though, if nothing has really changed since you last applied, we won't be able to change our decision.

What about other lenders?

Different lenders have different policies, and their credit scoring systems will reflect these. That means, another lender could accept you for credit, even if we turn you down.

Your application to us and decision are completely confidential – we won't share them with anyone else. However, please be aware the credit reference agency may record the fact that we have looked at your file, and other lenders may take this into account when they consider your application.

Credit reference agencies made simple

So who are these credit agencies we've mentioned previously? A credit reference agency gathers and stores financial and public information available about almost every adult in the UK. It doesn't make decisions about whether you should receive credit, it simply provides factual information to help financial organisations like us decide whether to accept your application.

The public information includes data from the Electoral Register that helps us identify you, plus details of any County Court Judgments or bankruptcies against you.

What's your credit history?

Your credit history is made up of information from credit providers across the UK. They share information with each other. So when someone applies for credit, it's possible to check how well a person has repaid money in the past. If you've always regularly repaid credit, this will look good on your application. Alternatively, if you weren't able to repay a loan on time, this might have a negative impact.

Based on our experience, people who have had financial difficulties in the past are more likely to have difficulties keeping up repayments in the future. So if you are already having difficulties, being able to get hold of more credit might not be helpful to you at this time.

We work with three credit reference agencies, Equifax, Callcredit and Experian. You can find their contact details on page 9.

How other people can affect you

You may have read in the press about people unfairly being refused credit – simply because someone who once lived at their address has a bad credit history. Rest assured, if we do ever take another person into account when you apply, it won't be because you've shared the same address. It will only ever be someone you are financially connected with.

What about people you live with?

When you apply for credit with us, we may take into account other members of your household with whom you have some sort of financial connection. For example, it could be someone you share an account with, or someone you have made a joint application with for credit in the past.

A credit reference agency won't provide us with information about someone who used to live at your address just for the sake of it. They will only ever do this if there has been a financial link with you and that other person.

Would some independent advice help?

If you've been refused credit there are places you can go to for help and advice. Try your local Trading Standards Department, Citizen's Advice Bureau or Consumer Advice Centre. The Information Commissioner also produces a leaflet called 'No Credit?' that you might find useful. Order a free copy from the Information Commissioner's website at www.ico.gov.uk or by telephoning 08456 30 60 60.

Seeing your credit details

You may want to see what information a credit reference agency holds about you. Especially if you've been turned down for credit. Agencies are required to let you have a copy of the information they hold – for this basic service they charge a fee of £2. You should find it fairly straightforward to see your details.

Simply write to the credit reference agency and ask them for a copy of your file. Their addresses are on page 9. Or use the forms at the back of this leaflet.

To help the agency match your details correctly with your file you'll need to include the following information:

- Your full name, as well as any change of name you've had
- Your date of birth
- Any address you've lived at over the past 6 years.

Don't agree with the information about you?

If the details a credit reference agency holds about you are correct, they can't change them. But of course, if something is wrong, their consumer help service will help you to put it right.

And what if a credit reference agency gives you information about people you live with, but you don't have any financial connection with them? You can change this too. The agency will send you details of your rights under the Consumer Credit Act 1974 and the Data Protection Act 1998 when you apply to see your details.

Get in touch with credit reference agencies

We try to be as up front and honest about our processes as possible. So we're happy for you to contact the agencies we work with at any time. After all, no one wants to think they might be refused credit unfairly because information about you isn't correct.
